One could argue that the combination of these two RDTs (combined with a traditional microscopy, malaria diagnosis) could also be provided at the point-of-care, in an integrated manner. However, the main aim of this demonstration was not to validate the diagnostic performance of the RDTs, but rather to assess the ability of RDTs to be used in actual, day-to-day health care activities, and its potential to be integrated into routine practice. The RDTs that we selected for this study could be used for such purposes because they can either provide a negative result (i.e. there is no parasitaemia) or a positive result (presence of malaria parasitaemia) at the point-of-care. In conclusion, this study shows that in resource-constrained settings, RDTs can be used as a rapid malaria diagnostic tool at the point-of-care, without the need for laboratory facilities or skilled staff. The malaria diagnostic performance of the RDTs that were used in this study were all good. This study also confirms that the ability of RDTs to detect malaria decreases with increasing parasite densities, which is a limitation in some settings with very high malaria prevalence. The performance of the RDTs assessed in this study is similar to those reported by others in low- and moderate-prevalence malaria settings \[[@B14],[@B15]\]. This study was part of a research project supported by MSD (France), Médecins Sans Frontières (Geneva, Switzerland), and the National Malaria Control Programme, Government of Kenya.
